"I will!" said the fox. He made a apring from his hiding place to get Uncle Wiggily, but the rabbit gentleman suddenly cried out:
"Oh, it's scorching! May handkerchief is scorching! I smell it! I forgot and left a hot find on it!" Back to the kitchen he hopped and took the hot, scorching flat from the handkerchief he had been froning.

The fox ran into the bungalow after Uncle Wiggily and tried to grab him.

The fox ran into the bungatow after Uncle Wiggity and tried to grab him. But the rabbit gentleman said:
"Oh, no! No, you don't! I see your trick now! You can't get me!"
Then Uncle Wiggily held the hot flat-iron out in front of himself and the fox bumped into it and burned his nose.

Not That Bad Off.

William Travers Jerome says an emigration agent for one of the western trunk lines was making a cross-country trip through the poorest part of the Tennessee mountains, seeking colonists for newly developed sections beyond the Mississippi, when he came to a barren and guilled hillside where to a barren and guilled hillside where a native in ragged garments plowed with the aid of a slabsided mule. Seeking a convert, the agent steered his buckboard up alongside the tottering rail fence which bounded the field, and hailed the plowman.

"My friend," he said, "why don't you guit wasting your life on this worthless soil? Why don't you sell out here and move to a country where your labor will bring you some fitting return?"
